On Saturday, January 21st, the City of New Castle was forced to perform an emergency demolition of the beloved Banks Building due to safety concerns, and forecasted strong and potentially damaging winds.

The Donald C. Banks Building

The Delaware Street wharf, as we know it, was built in 1914. The Trustees paid $7000, which is believed to have been half the cost of its construction. The only building left on the wharf at the foot of Delaware Street from the time of New Castle's industrial era, until its recent demise, was the Banks Building. It was a rare wooden survivor of a nineteenth century commercial structure, in the vernacular Italianate style. Named for Donald C. Banks, a prominent resident of the town, a Trustee of the Common, and a Trustee of the Good Will Fire Company, the building enjoyed many uses since it was built in 1871 as an office and place of refuge for William Jefferson.

Over time it served as a custom house, a marine exchange, headquarters for a coal yard and an office for the telegraph. The Banks Building was the property of the City of New Castle and is best remembered today as the meeting place of the "Senate", a group of older, retired men who gathered there through decades and generations for coffee and conversation. The "Senate" met at various locations, most famously at White's Ice Cream Parlor, a former long-term town fixture at 204 Delaware Street.*

The City had been aware of the building's depressed condition and had taken steps toward restoring it. An expert was hired in 2011 to evaluate its state and provide an outline for a path forward to renovate and identify funding sources. The foundation, floor joists, floors, walls, woodwork, stairs, siding and roofing were all in need of repair.

With a nor'easter approaching and high winds in the forecast last weekend, City officials swiftly moved to the demolition option rather than chance what Mother Nature might bring. Social media comments ranged from shock and disbelief to the sadness of a lost landmark. Most blamed the City for letting it deteriorate over so many years. What's to renew the vacant space? A covered gazebo with benches has been mentioned, as well as a visitors center.

One sound idea offered: "if they consider rebuilding, how about getting the schools involved? William Penn has an engineering design group. Split the construction among the remaining Vo-Tech schools; maintenance of a structure will need to be considered."
