Southpaw

This cute-sounding term -- which may actually be seen as kind of annoying by some left-handers -- originated in sports. The real question is, which sport and why? The popular answer usually puts the term's origin in baseball, claiming that baseball diamonds were designed so that pitchers faced west and batters faced east, supposedly to avoid having the batter stare into the afternoon sun. That would mean a lefty pitcher's pitching hand would be on the south. However, many baseball diamonds were not aligned this way, and there is evidence that the term "southpaw" was first used in boxing. There are also political cartoons showing left-handed punches with "southpaw" appearing in the caption or punchline.
