The Buzz About Your Morning Joe

Many of us reach for that cup of joe, morning after morning... and even into the afternoon and evening for an extra boost of energy; researchers at UCLA may have just found a new reason to justify the habit.

Coffee has been shown to have many health benefits including lowering risk of stroke, cancer, Alzheimer's, and dementia. Coffee is chock full of antioxidants, and its caffeine content has been linked to easing headaches and increasing endurance. Studies have also consistently shown an inverse relationship between coffee consumption and risk for type II diabetes. It was previously thought that coffee may improve the body's tolerance to glucose by increasing metabolism or improving the insulin response.

Now, researchers may have discovered the mechanism behind coffee's protective effect. It all boils down to the protein, SHBG (sex hormone-binding globulin) which regulates the biological activity of testosterone and estrogen in the body, both of which have been thought to play a role in the development of type 2 diabetes.
